When Jay Gould was in Galveston and, accompanied by a number of leading citizens, was inspecting the Cotton Exchange, a small boy was seized by Exchange, a small boy was seized by one of the Galveston gentlemen just as the gamin was picking the great railroad magnate's pocket. "What did the little fellow do?" asked Gould. "He stole your pocket-handkerchief. Mr. Gould, and I am going to turn him over to a policeman." "Don't do that," replied Mr. Gould, smiling good naturedly; "let him go. We should not discourage young beginners. I had to courage young beginners. I had to start out in a modest way myself when I went into the railroad business," and reaching down into his pocket Mr. Gould took up a quarter and gave it to the boy, to encourage him to aim high-er.—Galveston News.
